Transcranial Doppler blood flow velocity (FV) patterns are compared with those of angiography in 18 patients with acute cerebral ischaemia. Despite the small sample size the results show that both methods are valuable in identifying the presence and direction of blood flow velocity through the circle of Willis and the anterior, middle or posterior cerebral arteries, particularly for obtaining side-to-side comparisons. FV reflects the continuity of blood flow and their direction of flow. A drop in FV without angiographic ischaemia often appears during reperfusion and is assumed to be due to the recovery of blood flow in collateral vessels. The direction of flow does not always correspond to the direction of the presumed atheroma and may be altered by capillary recruitment, decreased diameter of collateral vessels, or embolism into the arterial or venous circulation. By contrast, FV can be prolonged for hours when the patient is receiving thrombolytic therapy and no angiographic ischaemia is present. This may be due to an aneurysmal bleeding or post ischaemic arterial vasospasm. A further problem relates to the difficulties encountered when FV is used as a diagnostic criterion. Whilst the FV patterns associated with aneurysmal subarachnoid haemorrhage and vasospasm often appear consistent, they are difficult to establish in other situations and intracranial haemorrhage may significantly increase flow in the middle cerebral artery.Axel

They didn't give a reason other than they didn't want them on a visible display in the store. SRS / IMT Supply / Radiac® Valve® I think the good news is that there are a number of distributors that are geared to this niche market. And if you are interested enough you can contact them directly. The downside is that you will have to get to the store and check them out. Or, there might be one at the local ARES meeting or in the local Boy Scouts or VFW hall. If you live in an area that does not have these distributors, then you will need to take your supply there and order it. I think it would
